Inhalt: External migration in Kosovo toward European countries has started in early '70s with guest workers, as result of a bilateral agreement between ex-Yugoslavia and west European countries (Swiss and Germany). Than during '80s and '90s has been taken place mainly migration for political reasons but without excluding those for economic reasons, as well. Than, after 2000 are migration for family reunion, marriages, education, etc. Initially all these migrations tend to be temporary migrants, however the majority of them ended up being long term and permanent migrants. This article highlight the practice of Industrial Citizenship (T.H. Marshall, 1950) among kosovar migrants into Europe, who's often miss their voice and exit opportunities to protect rights and defend their interests in satisfactory level. We argue that due of their low education, difficulties to learn foreign language and often social and spatial segregation, their integration into host societies was poor and hard to achieve. Moreover, the absence of state in their country of origin has created a sense of living as a second-class people and a feeling of inferiority. This situation has led them to stay connected within their community, in way to help and protect each other. However, considering the advantages of living in Europe many of them decided to stay and make living into host countries, often bringing their family members along.
